California State University, Dominguez Hills is a comprehensive, urban campus located in the city of Carson, primarily serving the greater Los Angeles metropolitan area. It is committed to educating a multi-ethnic and multicultural student population for leadership roles in the global community of the 21st century. CSU Dominguez Hills has become the "most diverse campus in the West," reported by the U.S. News & World Report.

From this position of remarkable diversity, the university’s commitment to excellence and pluralism in higher education furthers the democratic society: wide participation and civic responsibility in community and economy. Building on its core of liberal arts and sciences, the university offers a broad range of programs in these fields as well as in the professions, enabling students to develop intellectually, personally, and professionally and to seek engaged participation in a world of change.

It is evident by the effort the world is undertaking in the use of information technology that educational institutions need to embrace this technology in their teaching and administration. The Leo F. Cain Educational Resource Center Addition and Remodel project will improve the use of technology in the university’s library. Most of the reader stations will provide computer connectivity to the information technology services of the library, campus, and the Internet.

The addition will provide space to support a student capacity of 12,000 FTE. The campus population is expected to exceed this by 2011. In anticipation, the university will request the renovation of the fifth floor of the facility for additional library space to support a capacity of 14,000 FTE as a future project. The university’s capital improvement plan provides for an orderly construction of additional facilities to allow for the renovation.

Two of four National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) Research Program grants in California were awarded to CSUDH faculty. The recipients, Timothy Chin, assistant professor of English, and Sarah Waller, assistant professor of philosophy, were awarded $24,000 each to pursue their research projects.

This project will build a 92,300 ASF/133,800 GSF addition for the library in the Leo F. Cain Educational Resource Center (#20). The addition will provide 41,000 ASF for book stacks (of which 4,800 ASF will be for an automatic storage and retrieval system), 41,800 ASF for additional student reader stations, 7,000 ASF for technical processing and public service areas, and 2,500 ASF for Multimedia and the Faculty Development Center. The project will also remodel four of the existing floors of library space to better coordinate library functions and address capital renewal needs. The future cost for equipment is $2,686,000.
